History

History of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, United States

The history of the city begins before the Revolutionary War. Lancaster is one of the oldest inland cities in the United States of America. It is 71 miles west of Philadelphia and is tucked between the mighty Susquehanna River on the north and the west. German immigrants, known as Pennsylvania Dutch (from "Deutsch" meaning German), were the first to settle in the area in 1709. At that time, it was known as "Hickory Town."

The honorable James Hamilton laid it out in building lots and out lots, and in May 10, 1729, it became the county seat. John Wright, a prominent citizen, gave it the name "Lancaster" after Lancaster, England where he formerly lived. The city is known as the "Red Rose City" due to its link to Lancaster, England. Lancaster became a borough in 1742, a chartered city on March 10, 1818 and surrendered its ancient city charter and became a Third-Class City under the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania on May 27, 1924.

Lancaster was an important munitions center during the Revolutionary War. It was the National Capital of the American colonies on September 27, 1777, when the Continental Congress was fleeing British forces (who had captured Philadelphia). From 1799 to 1812, Lancaster was the capital of Pennsylvania. It was incorporated as a borough in 1742 and incorporated as a city in 1818.

Lancaster, Pa.

Lancaster is located about 70 miles from Philadelphia, 80 miles from Baltimore and 110 miles from Washington D.C.
